

When they had arrived at that place, they were in single file, first Pantaleon, a leading citizen of Setolia, they entered a path, and the king began conversation. Then ^{two} plotters sprung up, and rolled down ~~two~~ huge stones, which one hit the king on the head, another his shoulder incontinens, he fell down from the path and onto a slope. The others undeven indeed, his friends and attendents ran away, after they had seen Eumenes fall, on the other hand Pantaleon courageously remained to protect the king.

The assassins, as if completed the deed, ran away into the summit of Parnassus with such desperate speed that, when one could not easily follow over the pathless ground and steep place, delayed the others escape, and killed his companion.

	At first the king's friends returned to his body, then the attendants and servants ran up; they lifted him up and were nothing but cautious of his wounds, nevertheless they realised he was alive from the warmth of his breath and they kept him on his chest: there was almost no hope for the king to live. But now is the king's friends were to be in control; they carried him to a ship, after they escaped they treated him and left the rumour of his death to spread across Asia.
