

An Attempted Assassination	DO NOT WRITE IN THIS MARGIN
First when Pantaleon, leader of Aetolia, (with whom the King had begun a conversation²), (when he^{it} came to that place¹) (where he^{it} had goneⁱⁿ single file¹) entered the path² to Then plotters, having sprung up, rolled down two huge stones², 1 of which the king's head was hit by one², his shoulder by another²; stunned, he fell down from the path onto the slope². And the rest indeed, (even the crowd of friends and attendants²) (after they saw Eumenes falling²) ran away²; Pantaleon, on the other hand, remained, fearless, to

protect the king

The assassins, as if completing the task, ran away onto the summit of Parnassus with such desperate speed that, when one not easily would follow over the pathless ground and steep places and would hold up the escape of the rest, they killed the companion

First friends then attendants and slaves ran up to the body of the king, lifting ^{up} him ~~up~~, stunned, with a wound, conscious of nothing - they ~~realised~~ realised that he ^{was living} ~~lived~~ from ^{his} warmth and remaining spirit in his chest: ~~almost~~ there was almost no hope that they

King would ^{live} survive, But ^{his friends} they carried the king, now in control
of himself, down to the ship:
then his care was so secret, that a rumour spread that he had died in Asia.