34)	These lines show that a Roman governor was expected to set an example of good military hardihood. They also ^{also} show that they were expected to publically settle the business disputes. They also show it was governors to ^{to} duties remain self-restrained, reasonable and sensible and not throw mad detached parties. They also show the it was governors duty to hold the assizes in the towns they controlled.
35a)	Cicero is making out that the capture of the pirate ship was so easy it was more accurate to describe it as taking the ship away rather than capturing it. He is also making the point that the capture of this ship was no achievement to be boasting about.
b)	Roman pirates made their money by pillaging coastal towns for valuable goods such as gold, tapestries and slaves and then selling them elsewhere. They also made their money via holding ransoms.

37)
Servilius captured pirates for the good of Rome and its people whereas Verres captured pirates for his personal gain. Servilius provided his citizens with the pleasure of seeing captured pirates punished whereas Verres denied them this. Servilius tried to capture as many pirates as he could whereas Verres would only bother when there was something to be gained for himself. Servilius harshly punished pirates whereas Verres accepted bribes from them.
Because they were tough, grueling places which served well as a punishment for lawbreakers. Because they were well guarded and escape was unlikely.

42)	It is amusing because in extract 8 Verres Cicero massively belittles Verres' achievements. It is also amusing because of Verres Cicero's repeated description of Verres' laziness and his description of him as like some king of Bithynia, a big softie. Another way it is amusing is because Cicero's description of Verres' party as some degraded equivalent of the battle of Cannae. Another way Cicero's description is amusing is him saying Verres had a woman for the romancing within every town in Sicily. Another way Cicero makes it it amusing is his description of Verres' Naxos achievement being the capture of an overloaded slow moving pirate ship. Cicero's repeated use of rhetorical questions throughout the text also helps to make Verres look silly and adds to the amusing atmosphere.
