

Candidate 1 evidence

Today I will be writing a blog on how to get on with your neighbours.

Firstly, there are a variety of good qualities to be a good neighbour such as greeting them every time you see them, this should be basic manners. Another good quality is offering help when needed, for example receiving their parcels if they aren't home. Another good quality to be a good neighbour is not being too noisy and disturbing their peace.

Secondly, building relationships with neighbours is a good idea because it will lead to everyone being comfortable living around each other. Another good thing about building relationships with your neighbours is you can do each other favours such as cutting the grass of your garden. A last advantage of building relationships with neighbours is you can spend time with each other.

Thirdly, tackling problems with your neighbours shows the type of person you are. Everytime you have issues with your neighbour you should always be respectful about it. For example if your neighbour has offended you, you should tell them about it instead of choosing war and anger, this only leads to concerning situations such as fighting or swearing to each other. Another mature thing to do is distance yourself from them (this is the best solution).

A last topic on how to get on with your neighbours is neighbourhood groups that you could do or suggest activities in. Decision making could also take place in these groups.
