	The young were a group of people the liberal reforms aimed to help as they were too young to work. The Education Provisions Act was passed in 1906 and this gave free school meals to children who lived in extremely poor families. The Administrative Provisions Act was introduced in 1907 and this gave free medical inspections to children throughout their time in school. This was important as the meals helped children concentrate and forus better in chassesoms as they were guaranteed at least one neal every school day which improved their health. However, they didn't receive this penefit during school holidays and so their health would delepisorate deteriorate back to its privious state,

The old were another group the reforms aimed to help as they couldn't nook due to their age. The Old Age Pension's Act was introduced in 1908 and this gave the elderly ab	Ø1∕6 financial situation. Married couples received 37p a week as single or vidaved pensioners received 5-25p a neck depende on their financial situation. They would edlect this at the pr Office. This was important as it provided the elderly with an income t help them buy basic needs like food, keeping them out of the northouse and from falling into porenty. However, the average life expectancy for the norker during this time was between 40-5. so many died before being able to receive this benefit whi	d reduces the overall effectiveness. In evaluation, the hiberal social reforms helped the p old to a limited extent as pension given was discovered to be know the poverty line	e - the minimum amount of income to not be in poverty - after a study by Rountree discovered that they were slightly under the poverty line, so it didn't help many old peop	le essape from poverty.

	In conclusion, the hiberal social reforms were effective in meeting the needs of the British people to a limited extent.
	On the one hand, the money provided to the old, the sick and the unemployed did assist them in buying basis needs.
	The young also benefitted from the medical inspections which	_

	The young weren't given critical funding for the treatment of their problems either. Overall, the hiberal social reforms were effective in nection the needs of the British people to a limited extent as there was too many drawbacks to each act and the hiberal reforms failed to try improve the housing problems too, which was a major issue.
