16)	Parliament and the government both have sets of powers to keep the other in check both having successes and failures. Parliament has power over the government is small meaning they have little success. I will look at the powers Parliament has to check the government but also what the government has to check back. Parliament can make the government look guilty and make them responsible for their actions through Prime Minister Questions. An example of this would be the questioning of the chief secretary on medicinal [^] malpractice issues and the government's view on the matter. However, committees must be made up in proportion to the majority currently in government meaning currently there would be a majority of Conservatives meaning they could ask flattery questions that makes the government look favourable. This shows the government's size and power can hinder Parliament's actions

	Another form of debate is the power of debate where governments and parliaments go head to head discussing and often arguing over several issues with the intention to have their own viewpoint to be considered. The correct one Parliament will usually use the time of debate to belittle the government by making comments on current action of legislation. An example of this would be the huge debate over Theresa May's Brexit strategy.

As they offer flexible hours but also because higher fears of employment are more likely to reject women as they believe they will lose them money. An example is this is shown when Sir Adam Smith stated he discriminates against hiring women as when they are pregnant they tend to cost you money. However improvements are being made with more women attending universities than men
